

Learning Disabilities: Learning from the Source

Want to know more about learning disabilities? Learning Disabilities: Learning from the Source portrays the voice of experience. Eight diverse people with learning disabilities are profiled. Each person effectively communicates wisdom, shares memories, experiences, goals, dreams and smiles as they invite you into their lives. Two staff, an instructor and case manager, model their knowledge and professionalism as they assist people with learning disabilities in school and at work.

Commissioned by the National Institute for Literacy (NIFL), this video helps train professionals to recognize learning disabilities, as well as helping those who have learning disabilities understand they're not alone.

Professionally produced by Leaping Media and the Instructional Broadcast Center of the Seattle Public Schools in collaboration with WDC staff Dan Fey and Beth Blanchard, the video is visually rich, including photos and video clips that enhance the in-studio shots. Sound clarity assures each voice is well heard and understood and graphics are lively and varied.

The video has been honored with the prestigious Telly Award for outstanding video production and the Annual Government Programming Award from the National Association of Telecommunications Officers and Advisors (NATOA).

"The personal interviews, the professional editing and the lively graphics really make these videos stand out," said Blanchard. "We're so excited about being able to reach an even wider audience with this important information."

Total running time: 56 minutes

Workforce Development Council of Seattle-King County (WDC) planner Beth Blanchard said "this project grew out of successful staff trainings across the country focusing on learning disabilities in an employment setting."
